

Your website could win £40,000

There's still time to enter this year's DTI/InterForum E-Commerce Awards – and win a cash prize of £40,000.

With just under a month to go until the application deadline of July 30, small firms across the UK are being urged not to miss out.

Already, hundreds of companies across the UK have started their entries, but time is running out.

With 12 regions across the UK and five regional and national categories, UK businesses have over 60 regional opportunities to win part of the total £214,000 cash prize.

In addition, further opportunities to win are presented in the three national-level innovation categories.

The awards are open to any UK firm with fewer than 250 employees.

The competition is judged on areas in which organisations can demonstrate business transformation – e-business start-ups, e-trading, e-business, best use of broadband communications and, new this year, best use of teleworking.

There are also three National Innovation Awards – use of mobile & wireless technology, advanced supply chain integration, and, also new this year, best rural e-business.

Set up by the DTI and InterForum, and sponsored nationally for the sixth consecutive year by the Royal Bank of Scotland Group, the E-Commerce Awards are the only government-backed technology awards.

Entries and nominations can be made freely via the dedicated website www.ecommerce-awards.co.uk ❖
